The advantages of this invention will benefit golfers who suffer from arthritis or have problems firmly gripping a golf club. Golfers who suffer from arthritis in their hands often have problems maintaining a firm grip on a golf club grip of conventional design which results in the golfer having problems pulling the golf club through the swing with his lead hand. The lead hand is defined as the left hand for a right-handed golfer and the right hand for a left-handed golfer. The golf club grip of this invention will allow the user to grip the club with less effort and less strain on the lead hand, making it easier for the user to pull the club through the swing with his lead hand.
